But these are matters for sober reflection, not for the running record of the morning after. Possibly one might pause long enough to wonder whether Dr. Muck had been reading Quintilian on oratory, for that eminent teacher advised the placing of the weakest arguments in the middle, and Dr. Muck had his weakest compositions in this well protected position.

The second sale of the Frederick R. the sonata "Pathetique" of Beethoven and Brahms's variations on a theme by Paganini, opus 35.

These compositions gave opportunity for a display of great breadth in technical resource and interpretation, not to ray of great physical endurance. Mme. Leginska approached her task with an undanned courage that carried with it undaunted courage that carried with it nuch abandon and in her performance evinced a large command of intellectual force together with a sweeping power in technic that frequently merged into an exhibition of dashing bravura.

Mme. Leginska's general style is now well known here, as are her certain ec-centricities of manner which have caused unfortunate comment. These exemplicities at times seem to detract from desirable repose in her work, while the very strength of personality from which they spring can too easily lend a foreign if not personal atmosphere to a foreign if not personal atmosphere to the work in hand.

This latter defect was especially obvious in her playing of the Bach music yesterday and caused it to lack something in the spirit and mood be-longing to this composer. But such flaws must perhaps be forgiven when they are in company with so many striking musical gifts as are possessed by Mme. Leginska.
